

A Brief Biography of James Fenimore Cooper (Annotated)

Originally published in 1897 in A Library of the Worlds Best Literature, Ancient and Modern, Volume 7 this Kindle edition, equivalent in length to a physical book of approximately 16 pages, describes the life and work of American novelist James Fenimore Cooper. Includes supplemental material: A Brief Summary of the Life of James Fenimore Cooper About the Leatherstocking Tales Sample passage: Though New Jersey may claim his birthplace, Coopers childhood from his second to his fourteenth year was passed on the then frontiers of civilization, at Cooperstown on the Susquehanna. There in the primeval forest, hard by the broad Lake Otsego and the wide-flowing river, the old Judge built his house and laid out his town. Trees, mountains, wild animals, and wild men nursed the child, and implanted in him seeds of poetry and wrought into the sturdy fibers of his mind golden threads of creative imagination. Then round about the hearth at night, men of pith and character told tales of the Revolution, of battle, adventure, and endurance, which the child, hearing, fed upon with his soul, and grew strong in patriotism and independence. Nobility was innate in him; he conceived lofty and sweet ideals of human nature and conduct, and was never false to them thereafter. The ideal Man the ideal Woman he believed in them to the end. And more than twice or thrice in his fictions we find personages like Harvey Birch, Leatherstocking, Long Tom Coffin, the jailers daughter in The Bravo, and Mabel Dunham and Dew-of-June in The Pathfinder, which give adequate embodiment to his exalted conception of the possibilities of his fellow creatures. For though portrayal of character in the ultra-refined modern sense of the term was impossible to Cooper, yet he perceived and could impressively present certain broad qualities of human nature, and combine them in consistent and memorable figures.

Criticism may smile now and then, and psychology arch her eyebrows, but the figures live, and bid fair to be lusty long after present fashions have been forgotten. About the author: Julian Hawthorne (1846-1934), a novelist in his own right, was the son of American novelist Nathaniel Hawthorne. Other works include Archibald Malmaison, Hawthorne and His Circle, and The Subterranean Brotherhood.
